Vale.

AUGUST 31st, 1868.

Far out into the dying summer night
I lean to fold her last hours to my breast;
Hallowed and holy—in the moon's calm light.
Her fair face fades to its eternal rest.

Upon the silent fields and meadow-lands
Lieth her winding-sheet of misty white;
Seen will invisible and ghostly hands
La Wrap and unfeld her beauty from my sight.

Through the full trees she ever sendeth back. Her lest fond kisses breathed out tenderly; Across the sea, upon the moon's broad track, Drifteth the sweet freight of her memory,

Sadly she lingers o'er a grave new-made, Fanning the blossoms there, unfaded yet; Flowers fresh with tears, upon her heart low-laid

Who taketh there her first lone sleep to-night. Who passed with all her beauty from the world, Laying her fair young head on Summer's breast,

No blight of Autumn on the hair's bright gold, Blue depths of child-like eyes kissed into rest. Still to the East we lift our longing eyes, Waiting to meet the new immortal day; God's Summer 'mid the palms of Paradise; Dear smiles given back to faces laid away, follows :-In one of the Northern towns of Vermont lived a young man whom I shall call Daniel Bryan. He was a lawyer by profession, and one of the most intellectual men in that section of the country. No one possessed the confidence of his friends more than he, and no one was better calculated to secure the good will and friendship of all with whom he came in contact. Business poured in upon him, and he failed not to give the utmost satisfaction.

At the age of 27, Bryan took to him-self a wife from among the most favored ones in the country. Mary Felton ex-perienced a strange pride when she gave her hand to the young lawyer, and if none envied her, many at least prayed that they might be as fortunate. But ere long a cloud came over the scene. Conviviality ran high among the mem-bers of the bar, and young Bryan pos-sessed one of those peculiar temperaments which at length gave the whole body SUGAR CURED HAMS and soul up to the demon of appetite. For the three years he followed the custom of the times without neglecting much of his business, but finally he sank into the lowest pit of degradation; when at the age of 35, he had become a confirmed drunkard. He now neglected his cilents altogether for he could not remain sober long enough at any one time to carry a case through court. The only business he had now upon his hands was the collecting of some few > small debts. On the evening of his 35th birth-day he joined the Washingtonian, and once more his bright genius shone out upon the world. But it could not last long; amid the examples of those who were his constant companions, he went back to his cups, and down he sank as rapidly as he had risen. In one short year from that time he was a miserable degraded thing. People who had left notes and accounts with him to be collected, called upon his wife, and hupon inquiring of her where he was, she would tell them he was away, Poor woman! They could not bear to dispute her, and they would was anxious about them. His poor wife answered him as usual-that her husband had gone away.

"My dear madam." returned Mr. Vinson, "I know your misfortune and I appreciate your feelings, but I must see your husband. If I can see him for even a minute, I can learn all I wish to know. Mary Bryan spoke not a word, but with tearful eyes turned away, and Mr. Vinson followed her. He found Mr. Bryan in a back room, stretched at full length upon the floor, with a jug of Medford rum by side! With much effort Vinson aroused the poor man to a state of semi-consciousness, and asked if he had done anything about the notes and accounts he had left with him.

"Yes," returned the lawyer in a weak, husky, hiccoughing voice, "I've deducted my per centage, and you'll find the rest in the trunk. Mary,s got the key."
Mrs. Bryan was called in, the key was produced, and Mr. Vinson found the money-four thousand and some odd hundred dollars-all right and safe. In worst moments Bryan never used for himself a single penny he held in trust. Hundreds there were who labored hard to reclaim the wanderer, but without effect. Year after year went by, and he sank lower and lower-yet his wife left him not. Her brother, a young lawyer, named Moses Felton, often urged her to forsake her husband, at the same time offering her a comfortable nome beneath his own roof, but she would not listen.

At length all hope was given up.— Week after week would the fallen man lie drunk on the floor, and not a day of PIVOT ACTION BRACE! real sobriety marked his coarse. I doubt if such a case was ever known. He was visited his sister. He offered to take her with him, but she would not go. "But why stay here?" urged the brother. "You are all faded away, and dis-
